WORK IN PROGRESS:

Revise and Resubmit Status:

Cross-Border Troubles? Interstate River Conflicts and Intrastate Violence: I examine the relationship between interstate river conflicts and intrastate violence such as riots, strikes, and civil wars in three regions. I argue that interstate disagreements over cross-border river basins increase the potential for intrastate conflict by creating unequal access to water resources, displacing populations due to damming and diversion projects, and increasing demands for freshwater as population growth occurs. I find that states that experience more interstate diplomatic conflicts over shared river basins are at a higher risk for multiple forms of intrastate conflict, raising the risk of internal conflict by as much as 800%. I also find that as the salience of contested river basins increase, states experience higher risks for internal conflict. Water quantity issues tend to be the strongest factor increasing domestic conflict, while navigational, water quality, and irrigation issues have little influence on civil conflict. Status: R&R decision at American Journal of Political Science.

Forum Shopping for the Best Adjudicator: Conflict Management and the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea (ITLOS) (coauthored with Emilia Justyna Powell): This paper analyzes states' selection of dispute settlement procedures in the 1982 United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea under Article 287, focusing on four compulsory procedures: 1) the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea (ITLOS), 2) the International Court of Justice (ICJ), 3) arbitration under Annex VII of the UNCLOS treaty or 4) arbitration under Annex VIII of the UNCLOS treaty. We argue that the dispute resolution procedures of the UNCLOS regime incorporate common law countries' desire for flexibility in conflict management. Common law countries prefer the multiplicity of options and the default procedure of arbitration, especially given their resistance to the use of the ICJ as the primary adjudicator for resolving maritime conflicts. This flexibility in the UNCLOS dispute settlement procedures results in a higher level of ratification (or accession) of the UNCLOS treaty by common law states relative to civil law, Islamic law, and mixed law states. Civil law countries ratifying the treaty are most likely to select the ICJ court as their preferred conflict management forum. Status: R&R decision at Journal of Conflict Resolution.

Energy Resources and the Risk of Conflict in Shared River Basins (with Sojeong Lee): This study examines trade-offs that states can make between energy resources such as oil and fresh water resources on shared international river basins. Is conflict more or less likely if a downstream state has energy resources that an upstream state desires? Can upstream states increase their demands against downstream states if they have more energy and water resources than their downstream neighbors? Using data in shared river basin dyads from 1946-2001, we examine the influence of four types of energy/water and upstream/downstream configurations on interstate conflict. We find that conflict is less likely in shared river basin dyads when downstream states have energy resources and upstream states produce no oil or natural gas. Militarized conflict occurs more often in dyads that are both energy producers or in situations where neither state extracts energy resources. We apply these general arguments to the Amu Darya and Syr Darya river basins in Central Asia. Status: R&R decision at Journal of Peace Research.

Under Review:

Bones of Democratic Contention: Maritime Disputes (with Kelly Daniels): Analyzing data from the Issue Correlates of War project, which includes diplomatic conflicts over maritime areas (1900-2007) in the Americas, Europe, Middle East, and Asia, we find that pairs of democracies have the highest chance of having maritime disputes among all pairs of countries in the same region. Three theoretical explanations are empirically evaluated to account for this pattern: 1) greater opportunities for democratic maritime conflicts given higher levels of economic productivity and the sizes of fishing fleets in democratic states, 2) the increasing securitization of maritime issues, especially after the terrorist attacks of September 2001, and 3) variations in the number of democracies across regional contexts. We discuss the implications of these findings for the democratic peace literature and the law of the sea regime.

Judicialization of the Sea: Bargaining under the UNCLOS Regime (with Andrew Owsiak): When two states agree to a judicialized dispute settlement process, does their bargaining behavior change under the court's shadow? We propose an affirmative answer by examining peaceful and militarized settlement of interstate maritime claims -- the universe of potential maritime conflicts that could appear before adjudicatory bodies. We first argue that legalization through the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea (UNCLOS) reduces the onset of maritime conflicts and increases peaceful negotiations by clarifying maritime law standards and articulating peaceful dispute mechanisms if conflicts remain intractable. We then theorize that states' commitments under Article 287 of the UNCLOS charter act as a form of judicialization by clarifying maritime law, increasing the costs of challenging the status quo, and elevating the possibility of adjudicatory processes for dispute settlement. We show empirically that these characteristics help states settle maritime claims peacefully, often without adjudication in the shadow of UNCLOS.

Shifting Standards for Political Methodologists? Historical Trends in the Society for Political Methodology (with Christopher Achen): This piece is part of a proposed P.S. symposium that seeks to understand "what is a political methodologist?" We provide some historical context to this question, describing how the Society for Political Methodology and its summer conference were created and how the organization has evolved since its inception in 1984. We describe the interests of the Society's founders and how they viewed political methodologists. We then discuss how those initial perspectives evolved over time as the Society increased in size and diversity and how the identity of political methodologists changed. Finally, we discuss whether the Political Methodology identity expanded to be more inclusive and then offer suggestions for further advancing the Society's reach and influence in political science.

Work in Progress:

Water Wars? Conflict and Cooperation over Cross Border Rivers and Maritime Areas: This book manuscript examines how countries handle diplomatic claims to fresh water and maritime resources and how water issues influence states' internal and external security risks. The project focuses on diplomatic conflicts over cross-border rivers, such as the Tigris-Euphrates, Amu Darya, and Syr Darya basins, as well as diplomatic conflicts over maritime areas, such as conflicts between China and its neighbors over the Diaoyu/Senkaku and Spratly Islands. My research identifies factors that increase the risks of interstate and intrastate violence over contested water resources and shows how cooperative treaties and international organizations can play an effective role in preventing escalation of diplomatic conflicts to severe levels of militarized clashes. The project also shows that regional river basin organizations and global organizations like the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea (UNCLOS) play a major role in fostering cooperative solutions for water conflicts.

Dynamic Specification Modeling Strategies for Pooled Time Series Data (with Clayton Webb): This paper argues that scholars employing pooled time series data should pay more attention to dynamic specification issues. We show that most political science studies using pooled data fail to test for panel unit roots or consider possible dynamic specifications for their models. When trying different specifications, scholars sometimes move in a specific to general modeling direction, when it is preferable to begin with a general model and then test restrictions on it. We show how consequential dynamic specification can be for inferences in pooled time series models using simulations. We also discuss how to handle specification issues for continuous and dichotomous independent variables.

Gendered Citation Patterns across Political Science and Social Science Methodology Fields (with Michele L. Dion and Jane L. Sumner): Accumulated evidence identifies discernible gender gaps across a number of dimensions of professional academic careers including salaries, publication rates and journal/book press placement, career progress, and academic service. This paper estimates the gender gap in citations and self-citations across disciplinary fields within political science (e.g., American, international relations, comparative, theory, and methodology) and across methodological fields within the following social sciences: political science, sociology, anthropology, and economics. We expect that fields within political science with more women will have smaller gender citation gaps. Likewise, we expect the gender gap in methods papers to be larger in methodological journals across the social sciences. To evaluate these hypotheses, we compile and analyze citation patterns following Mitchell et al. (2013) for top-ranked journals within political science and those journals with a focus on social science methodologies.

Autocratic Regimes and Diversionary Uses of Force (coauthored with Olga Chyzh and Brian Lai): This paper analyzes the variance in autocratic regimes' propensity to use force for diversionary purposes while controlling for states' opportunities to use force. Theoretically, we expect military regimes to use diversionary force more frequently than party regimes and for strongman regimes that combine characteristics of military control and personalist leaders to be most belligerent in the face of domestic turmoil. Empirical analyses of politically relevant directed dyads from 1960-2001 provide strong support to the theory, showing that military regimes and strongman regimes are much more likely than other autocratic regimes to initiate the use of force when inflation is high. However, these effects are conditioned by opportunities for states to use force, as diversionary motives manifest themselves most clearly in the context of interstate rivalry.
